

When Your Business Needs Multinational Insurance

In a world of continued global expansion, it is common practice for corporations to work beyond the borders of the United States. While a company's international dealings may create great business opportunities, it can also create unique challenges when assessing and constructing global insurance solutions. If not properly handled, companies may be exposed to coverage gaps and non-compliance issues. Multinational business insurance can fill that need by providing coverage for a company's operations outside the United States.

The need for Multinational business insurance can occur in many different cross border activities. This can be anything from full-scale international operations to employee trips outside the United States. The following are typical scenarios where a company should consider pursuing multinational business insurance:

- Foreign sales including imports or exports.
- Business travel outside of the U.S.
- Physical overseas facilities and/or assets
- International subsidiaries or joint ventures.
- International Payroll or U.S. employees living and/or working abroad.
- Overseas manufacturers or customers.
- Government contracts outside the U.S.
- Study abroad programs.
